1. The Chinese Communist Volunteer Army Headquarters* was originally assigned 3 motor transport corps to handle military shipments. As their supply lines lengthened these units were found insufficient; consequently, drivers were drafted and motor vehicles were commandeered from various major administrative areas such as the East China Area. All motor transport under the Volunteer Army Headquarters has been organized into a single unit named the Anti-American and Aid Korea Volunteers Motor Transport Corps.

2. The military transport organization in North Korea is the Combat Supply and Service Command of the Combat Command of the Volunteer Army. The Combat Supply and Service Command controls 6 departments, each of which commands 4 or 5 quartermaster stations. These stations are also known as transport commands.

3. Twenty-five quartermaster stations existed in North Korea by mid-January, commanding a total of 14 motor-transport battalions. Each battalion comprises 4 companies; each company comprises 3 platoons; each platoon comprises 9 squads; each squad has 6 motor vehicles, 12 drivers and 6 assistants.
